

The Scheduling Playbook

SCHEDULING

— DRIFTING — GOVERNING

Your calendar is full, but it is not governing. Your meetings recur out of habit; few of them force a decision. The rhythm exists — the enforcement does not. Right now, motion is being mistaken for progress, and the seams between your functions are slipping while everyone feels busy.

THE RISK

Scheduling theater — a full calendar that governs nothing.

YOUR MOVES

- 01 Run the skip test. Take each standing meeting and ask: if we cancelled it for a month, what would break? If the honest answer is “nothing,” it was never governing. Delete it.
- 02 Make every meeting force a decision. For each meeting that survives, name the single decision it exists to produce. A rhythm that forces no decision is a calendar entry, not a governing mechanism.
- 03 Turn one agenda into a contract. Rewrite your most important agenda as an enforcement contract: the decisions to be made, the owners, and the evidence required before the room clears.

THIS WEEK

Pick your most important recurring meeting and define, in one sentence, the decision it must force. Bring that sentence to the next session.

*Build the cadence. The seam will hold.
